An Intelligent Horse.—Some years ago, the citizens of Centerville, Indians, were often amused by the conduct of a horse when, with others, he was turned into the barn-yard to be watered. One day, approaching the trough and finding it empty, he seized the pump-handle, to the surprise of the witness, between his teeth, and pumped water sufficient for himself and the other horses. Having thus begun, he was allowed when so inclined, to wait upon him-level when so inclined, to wait upon him-level when so inclined, to wait upon him-level when so inclined, to wait upon himwater sufficient for himself and the other horses. Having thus begun, he was allowed, when so inclined, to wait upon himself and companions afterwards. But it was observed that he always drove the other horses away until he had quenched his own thirst, after which he pumped for the companiod with good reference as to character, researchibity, etc.
